

Population Growth in Major Cities (1875-1910)

Abstract

German cities experienced enormous growth during the Bismarckian and Wilhelmine periods. The population of Berlin, for example, more than doubled between 1875 and 1910. In addition to reflecting astounding growth rates, the population figures below document one significant consequence of German industrialization: migration from the country to the city, where people hoped to find new work. The table illustrates the extent of this shift. But a closer analysis of the statistics for the period 1875–1910 also reveals important disparities in the growth rates of particular cities. (Here, the year 1890 can be used as a "before and after" point for analyzing population growth.) For example, the population growth rate of Magdeburg, a city in central Germany, declined after 1890, as did the growth rate of Leipzig, a city in the Kingdom of Saxony, but Leipzig still continued to grow at twice the rate of Magdeburg. By contrast, cities like Duisburg and Essen, located in the Ruhr district of western Germany, grew more rapidly after 1890 than they had up to that point.
