

“The South Seas are the Mediterranean of the Future” (July 13, 1884)

Abstract

The reluctance with which Bismarck participated in Germany’s colonial program in 1884 is belied by the self-satisfied pose he adopts in this satirical cartoon from Kladderadatsch. South of the equator, hidden beneath the waft of smoke emanating from Bismarck’s long pipe, the other European powers—not Germany—are busily acquiring new colonies. A Frenchman has spread his arms wide, trying to embrace Africa from east to west. A British sailor has found handholds in India and the Middle East, a tiny Dutchman grasps for the East Indies, a Japanese man has his eye on east Asia, a Russian pokes his head out at Merw in Persia, which had been acquired in 1884, and even an American is “shaking a leg” as the race for colonies heats up. A tiny flag planted in Southwest Africa marks Angra Pequena, which had become a German protectorate on April 24, 1884, when the Bremen merchant Adolf Lüderitz established a trading outpost there. Kladderadatsch’s implied criticism is that Bismarck was so engrossed in his program of “social reform” in the 1880s that he failed to recognize the importance of colonial possessions.

Source

Source: “Die Südsee ist das Mittelmeer der Zukunft” [“The South Seas are the Mediterranean of the Future”], Kladderadatsch, vol. 37, no. 32 (July 13, 1884), p. 128. Universitätsbibliothek Heidelberg. Available online at: <https://doi.org/10.11588/diglit.2265#0288>

Recommended Citation: “The South Seas are the Mediterranean of the Future” (July 13, 1884), published in: German History in Documents and Images, <<https://germanhistorydocs.org/en/forging-an-empire-bismarckian-germany-1866-1890/ghdi:image-1428>> [May 01, 2024].