

U.S. President Jimmy Carter and Chancellor Helmut Schmidt at the G7 Conference in London (May 7–8, 1977)

Abstract

On May 7–8, 1977, a G7 (Group of Seven) summit meeting took place in London. The “Downing Street Summit,” as it was called, gave newly elected U.S. President Jimmy Carter his first opportunity to appear on the international stage. In their joint declaration, state and government leaders described curbing inflation and creating jobs as their most urgent tasks. In order to reduce their dependence upon petroleum imports, energy was to be saved. Additionally, more energy—especially nuclear energy—was to be produced. The main point of contention between Carter and Schmidt was nuclear proliferation; against the objections of the Carter administration, the Schmidt government approved the export of nuclear technology valued at more than 10 billion U.S. dollars from the Federal Republic to Brazil. The photograph shows Jimmy Carter (front left), Helmut Schmidt (front right), Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher (back left), and U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance (back right) at the residence of the American ambassador in London.

Source

Source: Jimmy Carter (front left), Helmut Schmidt (front right), Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher (back left), and U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance (back right) at the residence of the American ambassador in London. Bundesbildstelle Bonn, no. 50 760/10.

Courtesy of the German Information Center

Recommended Citation: U.S. President Jimmy Carter and Chancellor Helmut Schmidt at the G7 Conference in London (May 7–8, 1977), published in: German History in Documents and Images, <<https://germanhistorydocs.org/en/two-germanies-1961-1989/ghdi:image-2425>> [April 28, 2024].