

Vocational School in the Ruhr Valley (1979)

Abstract

In a 1964 report on vocational training in the Federal Republic, the “German Committee on the Educational System” coined the term “dual system” to describe a type of education that took place both in the workplace and in vocational schools. The Vocational Training Law of August 14, 1969 [Berufsbildungsgesetz or BBIG] established a legal framework for the dual system and allowed it to be systematized to a greater degree. Additionally, Chancellor Willy Brandt’s second cabinet decided upon a new division of responsibilities in the area of vocational training: starting in 1973, the Federal Ministry for Education and Research was responsible for addressing fundamental issues concerning vocational training and for ensuring its overall coordination, while various ministries were charged with overseeing the organization of occupational training in their respective areas of influence.

Source

Source: Original caption: Sigfried Sill, vocational school teacher from the Ruhr district, 1979. Photo: INP/ Böcker-Karmon. Signature: BF 10 (VI-79)-2. German Information Center.

Courtesy of the German Information Center

Recommended Citation: Vocational School in the Ruhr Valley (1979), published in: German History in Documents and Images, <<https://germanhistorydocs.org/en/two-germanies-1961-1989/ghdi:image-2387>> [April 27, 2024].